Okay, this is an opinion. Based on the reviews so far, the reason that PS is not included in a CC subscription is because it is not a LACK OF FEATURES, it is lack of FOUNDATION. I will admit to not understanding why it should be included at all. With the idea that it, like PP, might be replaced with another app, there is a programming team that must work on PS. It is such a crucial programme that it must be finished in order for the software to be updated. If it's not finished, neither will the upgrade. You need to have some sort of thing to take down the wall of a burning house. You can't put it up again until it's finished. To expose it to some other program to be included with a subscription, and then before you know it, you must ask the community, "Alright, here. Take this next and replace that other thing, then it's done." That won't go as you can imagine. The feature parity will not be there. Adobe have some exciting programmes coming out in the next few months, like their CS6. If you have a subscription, CC will be available to you as soon as it's released (for a short while), or at least when it is released to you. I don't understand why it isn't a part of the subscription. Sharpening tools create an enhancement to the image's appearance that is intended to make the image more visually appealing. Adobe now allows you to let Photoshop do just that, and adds an option that generates an image "stroke." The Sharpen to Tint tool allows you to apply Style Mask (a Photoshop tool) to the image's sharpening. Simply use the Adjustments panel's Sharpen tool to create the initial image and use the Sharpen to Tint tool to create a sharpened image. One of the most impressive additions is new lens-correction elements in Lightroom 5. Lightroom 5 allows you to control lens corrections for most classes of photos with the existing, fully customizable Lens Corrections tool.

You may be wondering: Why are color pickers and pattern panels always available only in Photoshop? While web browsers are great at displaying images of all types, they often don't support self-contained color and pattern panels like Photoshop's. Relaying all this information across the web to a web page that is reviewing the entire document is complex. It's why we chose a different path: to run Photoshop with the web without a browser window, using native toolkits that improve developer productivity and remove the hurdles that keep people from accessing the tools they need. How It Works: For the web, we use a new version of WebAssembly, which is a web application virtual machine. Because we are no longer using a browser window, we can take advantage of Chrome's Crankshaft compiler to generate native code. We packaged Photoshop and create a really high quality version of it to access this. When you view the application in the experiment, the front end is still running in a browser. The web page just shows you what's in the Photoshop document. Best Beginner's Version of Photo Editing Software
